

They did see it! They went over to it and then headed back towards the main group. From Caleb's perspective, he could see the end of this group and there were a lot of people. He had never seen so many. The men were talking with a couple of men and it looked as though they were describing the beach.

NO! The group kept coming! It seemed like no time before the exceedingly large group of people were filing into the beach area. It could hardly contain them. The bomb was still there. The timer was still counting down.

It was getting darker and Caleb noticed that he could see quite well despite the fading sunlight. He looked back down into the canyon and could see another large group of people coming towards the beach. These people were on horses and appeared to be an army of sorts.

The first group of people started to panic and move towards the water while the second group came closer. Caleb could see the timer was just about to end. He screamed.

Joshua was shaking him. "Boss! Wake up! You are having a nightmare."

Caleb woke up with his heart racing. Was it just a dream? It seemed so real.

He went to the bathroom and splashed water on his face to help him wake up.

He stepped into the kitchen to get some coffee. Dorothy was sitting at the table and she asked him how he slept. He recounted the dream to her. She listened as he told her and was surprised by the detail he described. She said he may have had some sort of vision, not just a nightmare.

As they spoke, he realized that he was holding her hand. He also noticed that she wasn't pulling away. She told him she had gotten the other wounds patched up and, aside from a few stitches, they were ok to move forward.

They talked deep into the night and he found himself falling for this woman he barely knew. They were leaning close to each other so he leaned forward and kissed her. She didn't pull back and they kissed softly until they heard one of the others coming up the hallway.

They got into the pub fine and again found a seat in the rear. The barmaid came over and took their order and asked them if they needed an umbrella.

"Why, yes. It always rains when you least expect it to."

"Meet me behind the butcher shop in 30 minutes."

He and Abraham got up and walked out to find the butcher shop.
